Terraform: Up and Running with Infrastructure as Code

Terraform is an open-source infrastructure as code (IaC) tool that allows you to define, manage, and provision infrastructure in a declarative manner. By writing infrastructure as code, you can ensure consistency, reduce errors, and improve collaboration.

Q: What is Terraform and why should I use it?

A: Terraform is an IaC tool that enables you to define your infrastructure in a declarative language called HashiCorp Configuration Language (HCL). By using Terraform, you can version control your infrastructure, automate provisioning, and manage changes centrally.

Q: How do I get started with Terraform?

A: To get started with Terraform, you will need to install the Terraform CLI on your local machine. Once installed, you can create a new project directory and initialize a Terraform configuration using the `terraform init` command.

Q: How do I define my infrastructure in Terraform?

A: In Terraform, you define your infrastructure using HCL modules. Modules group related resources together and can be reused across multiple projects. To create a module, you will need to write a `.tf` file that specifies the resources you want to provision.

Q: How do I provision my infrastructure using Terraform?

A: Once you have defined your infrastructure in HCL, you can provision it using the `terraform apply` command. This command will create or update the resources specified in your Terraform configuration.

Q: How do I manage changes to my infrastructure using Terraform?

A: Terraform allows you to track changes to your infrastructure over time. You can view the differences between your current infrastructure and the proposed changes using the `terraform plan` command. To apply the changes, you can use the `terraform apply` command as mentioned earlier.
