American Association of Cereal Chemists (AACC)

The American Association of Cereal Chemists (AACC) is a professional organization dedicated to advancing the science and technology of cereal grains and their products.

AACC Designation

The AACC assigns a designation number to each of its approved methods. This designation is typically a four-digit number, such as AACC 2000.

Methods of Analysis of Ash

There are several methods for analyzing the ash content of food products:

- Gravimetric method: The sample is ignited at a high temperature, and the remaining ash is weighed.
- Titrimetric method: The ash is dissolved in water, and the solution is titrated with a standardized acid or base.
- Conductimetric method: The conductivity of the ash solution is measured.

AACC Method for Ash

The AACC method for ash analysis is AACC 001.01. This method uses the gravimetric method to determine the ash content of cereal grains and their products.

AACC Method for Farinograph

The AACC method for Farinograph is AACC 54-21.01. This method uses the Farinograph to measure the rheological properties of wheat flour.

Formula for Ash Analysis

The formula for calculating the ash content of a sample is:

Ash content (%) = (Weight of ash / Weight of sample) x 100

AACC 2000

AACC 2000 is the 11th edition of the "Approved Methods of the AACC" and provides standardized analytical methods for cereal chemists.

Umuc

Umuc is the University of Maryland University College.

MTAC

MTAC is the Missile and Terrorism Analytical Center.

MCCS in the Army

MCCS in the Army stands for Morale, Welfare, and Recreation Command.
