Faith, to a Puritan, was dearer than life, and to lose it and the connection to God was considered a grave loss. Likewise, the fear of the unknown drives much of the paranoia early in the story. Goodman Brown fears evil and death in the forest but not the town.

It is unclear whether the encounter in the forest was a dream, but for the rest of his life, Goodman Brown is changed. He cannot trust anyone in his village or fully love his wife. He lives the remainder of his life in gloom and fear.

Why does it not matter if Goodman Brown only dreamed the story? Crucially, it doesn't matter to Goodman Brown whether what he saw in the forest was a dream or reality—he himself doesn't know, but he still can't let go of what he thought he saw, and it poisons the rest of his life.
