The Fiction of Fact-Finding: Modi and Godhra

Q: What is the "Fiction of Fact-Finding"?

A: The "Fiction of Fact-Finding" is a term coined by Manoj Mitta to describe the phenomenon of selective and biased fact-finding reports that are often used to support pre-determined conclusions or narratives. These reports often cherry-pick evidence, disregard inconvenient facts, and fail to provide a balanced and impartial account of events.

Q: How does Manoj Mitta apply this term to the Godhra incident?

A: Mitta argues that the official report on the Godhra train burning in 2002, which was widely blamed on Muslims, was a classic example of the "Fiction of Fact-Finding." He contends that the report ignored crucial evidence that could have implicated others in the incident and failed to consider alternative explanations for the fire.

Q: What are the specific criticisms Mitta raises about the Godhra report?

A: Mitta points out that the report was based solely on the statements of eyewitness accounts, which have been known to be unreliable, especially in emotionally charged situations. He also notes that the report ignored forensic evidence and failed to consider the possibility that the fire may have been accidental.

Q: Why does Mitta believe the Godhra report was motivated by bias?

A: Mitta argues that the report was intended to serve a political agenda by providing a scapegoat for the widespread violence that followed the Godhra incident. He points out that the report was commissioned by the state government, which was led by Narendra Modi, who has been accused of complicity in the subsequent riots.

Q: What are the implications of Mitta's critique for understanding the Godhra incident?

A: Mitta's critique raises serious questions about the accuracy and reliability of the official narrative surrounding the Godhra incident. It suggests that the incident may have been more complex than it is commonly portrayed and that the official report may have played a role in fueling tensions and justifying the violence that followed.
