What is a Logical Language?

A logical language is a formal language that has a well-defined syntax and semantics. The syntax of a language specifies the rules for constructing well-formed formulas in the language. The semantics of a language specifies the meaning of these formulas.

What are the Main Types of Logical Languages?

There are two main types of logical languages: propositional logic and predicate logic. Propositional logic is the simpler of the two and is concerned with the logical relationships between propositions. Predicate logic, on the other hand, is more complex and allows for the representation of more complex statements, such as statements about objects and their properties.

What are the Basic Symbols of Logical Languages?

The basic symbols of logical languages include logical operators, such as negation (\neg), conjunction (\wedge), disjunction (\vee), implication (\rightarrow), and equivalence (\leftrightarrow), as well as variables and constants. Variables are used to represent unknown values, while constants represent specific values.

How are Logical Statements Evaluated?

The validity of logical statements is evaluated using truth tables. A truth table shows the truth value of a logical statement for all possible combinations of truth values of its component propositions. A statement is considered valid if it is true for all possible combinations of truth values.
