How does Braitman argue the values of understanding the mentality of animals in understanding the mentality of ourselves? Braitman, who holds a Ph. D. in history and anthropology of science from MIT, argues that we humans are far from unique in our capacity for “emotional thunderstorms that make our lives more difficult” and that nonhuman animals are bedeviled by varieties of mental illness strikingly similar to our own.

What is Olson's thinking animal argument? Philosopher Eric Olson argues that our fundamental identity aligns with being biological organisms within the animal kingdom. This puts the existence of a 'human' essence in question and has implications for life after death, consciousness transfer, transhumanism and even environmental responsibility.

What is the value of understanding animals when trying to understand the human psyche? By studying animal behavior, humans can also learn more about their own behavior—a field known as comparative psychology.
