Section 1228.4 Carbon Monoxide Detection in Commercial Buildings

The California Building Standards Code (CBC) requires carbon monoxide (CO) detectors to be installed in certain commercial buildings for the safety and well-being of occupants. This article provides a question-and-answer guide to help building owners and managers understand the requirements of Section 1228.4.

1. What types of commercial buildings are required to have CO detectors?

CO detectors are required in new and existing commercial buildings that meet any of the following criteria:

- Enclosed parking areas or garages that are attached to or within a commercial building
- Commercial buildings with a gas appliance used for heating or cooking
- Commercial buildings with an enclosed mechanical room containing a gas water heater or other gas-fired equipment
- Commercial kitchens with gas-fired appliances

2. Where should CO detectors be installed?

CO detectors must be installed in the following locations:

- Within 10 feet of each enclosed parking area or garage entrance
- Within 20 feet of each gas appliance used for heating or cooking in a living unit or bedroom
- Within 20 feet of each entrance to an enclosed mechanical room containing a gas water heater or other gas-fired equipment
- Within 20 feet of each gas-fired appliance in a commercial kitchen

3. What type of CO detector should be used?

CO detectors used in commercial buildings must be listed to UL 2034, UL 2075, or a comparable standard recognized by the code enforcement agency. Detectors must be powered by AC or DC electricity, or a combination thereof.

4. What are the maintenance requirements for CO detectors?

CO detectors must be tested and maintained in accordance with the manufacturer's instructions. Detectors should be replaced every 5-10 years, depending on the manufacturer's recommendations.

5. What are the penalties for not installing CO detectors in commercial buildings?

Failure to install CO detectors in accordance with Section 1228.4 may result in fines, penalties, or other enforcement actions by the code enforcement agency.
