Statistics for Experimental Economists

Q: What are the unique statistical challenges faced by experimental economists?

A: Experimental economists conduct controlled experiments to test economic theories and hypotheses. Unlike observational data, experimental data often involves randomization and controlled treatment conditions. This raises specific statistical challenges, such as analyzing data with heterogeneous treatment effects, controlling for multiple comparisons, and accounting for potential bias.

Q: Which statistical methods are commonly used in experimental economics?

A: Common statistical methods used include:

- Hypothesis testing (e.g., t-tests, ANOVA)
- Regression analysis (e.g., linear regression, logistic regression)
- Non-parametric tests (e.g., Wilcoxon rank-sum test, Kruskal-Wallis test)
- Bayesian statistics

Q: What are the considerations for selecting statistical methods in experimental economics?

A: The choice of statistical method depends on the research question, the nature of the experimental design, and the type of data collected. Factors to consider include:

- Sample size and power analysis
- Assumptions of the statistical test
- Robustness of the results to alternative modeling choices

Q: How do experimental economists deal with multiple comparisons?

A: Multiple comparisons occur when multiple statistical tests are performed on the same dataset. To control for family-wise error rate, researchers use methods such as the Bonferroni correction or the Benjamini-Hochberg procedure. These techniques adjust the significance levels of the individual tests to account for the increased probability of false positives.

Q: What are the ethical considerations in using statistical methods in experimental economics?

A: Researchers must ensure that statistical methods are used appropriately and ethically. This includes:

- Avoiding data manipulation or selective reporting
- Reporting results accurately and transparently
- Considering the potential biases or limitations of the experimental design
