What is the user name and password? The username is an identifier: it tells the computer who you are. In contrast, a password is an authenticator: you use it to prove to the operating system that you are who you claim to be. A single person can have more than one Unix account on the same computer. In this case, each account would have its own username.

What username and password should I use? Use a mix of alphabetical and numeric, a mixture of upper and lowercase, and special characters when creating your unique passphrase. Use unique passwords or passphrases: You should have a unique password for each of your accounts. This way, if one of your accounts is compromised, your other accounts remain secure.

Why is the use of username and password important? Most of our online accounts are protected by a username and password combination. These passwords protect the data that we store in our accounts, whether that is our bank details, our purchase history or our home address.

Why is Linguascope not working? Check the expiry date of your log-in details. If you have renewed recently, you will probably have a new password, and your username may have changed; check with your named contact for Linguascope for these details. If your details are still valid, try accessing the site from a different computer.
