U2 at the End of the World: A Dialogue with Bill Flanagan

Question: Bill, you've been with U2 for decades as their biographer and friend. How do you think they've evolved over the years?

Answer: U2 has always been a band that's willing to take risks and push boundaries. They've moved from their early punk roots to embrace a more experimental and introspective sound. What hasn't changed is their commitment to social justice and their ability to connect with audiences on a deep emotional level.

Question: You've witnessed U2 play countless concerts. What makes their live performances so special?

Answer: U2's live shows are a transformative experience. The band has an incredible energy on stage, and their performances are full of passion and intensity. Bono, in particular, is a charismatic frontman who commands the crowd. The setlists are always varied and feature a mix of classic hits and new material.

Question: What do you think is U2's legacy?

Answer: U2 is one of the most successful and influential bands in history. They've won 22 Grammys and have sold over 150 million records worldwide. But their impact goes beyond their music. They've been vocal advocates for human rights and poverty reduction, and they've used their platform to raise awareness for important issues.

Question: What do you think the future holds for U2?

Answer: I think U2 still has a lot of great music to make. They're constantly evolving and innovating, and I'm excited to see what they do next. I also believe that they will continue to use their influence for good and that they will remain one of the most important bands in the world.

Question: What are your personal memories of covering U2 over the years?

Answer: I've had the privilege of covering U2 for over 30 years, and I've seen them grow from a young band into global superstars. I've been with them on tour, in the studio, and at countless press conferences. My favorite memories are the times I've spent with them offstage, talking about music, life, and the world around us.
