Question 1: What is the central tenet of Ernest Becker's "The Denial of Death"?

Answer 1: Becker argues that humans have an innate fear of death, which they attempt to suppress through various forms of denial and symbolic immortality.

Paragraph 2: The Existential Terror

Becker believes that this fear of death manifests as an "existential terror," a deep-seated anxiety that drives human behavior. Without a meaningful way to confront this terror, individuals engage in heroics, creativity, and other attempts to achieve symbolic immortality.

Paragraph 3: The Denial and the Hero

Becker identifies two main ways in which humans deny death: the "heroic" and the "anxious." The heroic individual embraces danger and risks in an effort to prove their worth and escape the fear of insignificance. Conversely, the anxious individual retreats into conformity and passive resignation, numbing themselves to their mortality.

Paragraph 4: The Symbiotic Solution

To cope with the existential terror, Becker suggests a "symbiotic solution." This involves sharing a communal vision of life and death, where individuals find meaning in their connection to a larger purpose or transcendence.

Paragraph 5: Implications and Applications

Becker's theory has significant implications for understanding human psychology, culture, and society. It suggests that many of our actions and beliefs are rooted in the attempt to deny or transcend our mortality. By acknowledging and confronting this terror, individuals can potentially live more authentic and fulfilling lives.
