Chip Formation: Processes and Types

What is Chip Formation?

Chip formation is the process by which material is removed from a workpiece during machining operations. The material removed is called a chip.

Shear Strain in Chip Formation

Shear strain is the deformation experienced by the material in the chip formation zone. It is calculated as the ratio of the horizontal deformation to the vertical deformation of the material.

Types of Chip Formation

There are three main types of chip formation:

1. Continuous Chip Formation: Occurs when the material is ductile, and the chip is formed by continuous shearing.
2. Discontinuous Chip Formation: Occurs when the material is brittle, and the chip is formed by breaking.
3. Segmented Chip Formation: A combination of continuous and discontinuous chip formation.

Orthogonal Cutting Model

The orthogonal cutting model is a simplified representation of the chip formation process that assumes the cutting tool is perpendicular to the cutting surface.

Shear Zone in Chip Formation

The shear zone is the region where the material deforms plastically during chip formation.

Effect of High Shear Plane Angle on Chip Formation

A high shear plane angle results in a thinner and wider chip, reducing cutting forces and tool wear.

Calculating Shear Strain

Shear strain is calculated using the expression:

$$\gamma = \tan(\phi)$$

where ϕ is the shear plane angle.

Basic Process of Chip Making

The basic process of chip making involves:

- Cutting the material with a sharp tool
- Creating a chip by plastic deformation of the material
- Removing the chip from the workpiece

Microchip Formation

Microchips are formed by a process called photolithography, which involves etching patterns onto a silicon wafer.

Chip Design Process

The chip design process involves creating the layout and circuitry for a microchip.

Chip Sequencing

Chip sequencing is the process of ordering and connecting the gates and components on a microchip.
