What is a prepositional object in German? A German prepositional object is a noun or pronoun that follows a preposition and completes the meaning of a verb, adjective, or another preposition, requiring a specific grammatical case.

How do German prepositions work? Some prepositions within the German language are two-way prepositions, which means they can be either accusative or dative. Is über dative or accusative? Grammatically, über belongs to that set of German prepositions that can govern either the accusative case or the dative case ("an, auf, hinter, in, neben, über, unter, vor, zwischen"). The choice is determined by whether the prepositional phrase indicates movement (accusative) or an unmoving state (dative).

Is gehen akkusativ or dativ? Does 'gehen' use the accusative or dative? 'Gehen' (to go) doesn't require either the accusative case (i.e. a direct object) or the dative case (i.e. an indirect object). 'Gehen' is an intransitive verb, which means it can be used with simply a subject (e.g. 'Ich gehe' [I'm going]).

When to use dative? Dative Case (Dativ): This case is for the indirect object, indicating to whom or for whom something is done. In "Ich gebe dem Mann das Buch" (I give the book to the man), 'dem Mann' is in the dative case because the man is the indirect recipient of the book.
