Stoichiometry Map for Chemical Reactions: Answers

Question 1:

How do I use a stoichiometry map to determine the limiting reactant in a reaction?

Answer:

To determine the limiting reactant, follow these steps:

1. Write the balanced chemical equation.
2. Calculate the moles of each reactant present.
3. Divide the number of moles of each reactant by its stoichiometric coefficient.
4. The reactant with the lowest ratio is the limiting reactant.

Question 2:

What is the difference between a theoretical yield and an actual yield?

Answer:

- Theoretical yield: The maximum amount of product that can be formed from a given amount of limiting reactant, assuming complete conversion.
- Actual yield: The amount of product actually obtained in the reaction, which is typically lower than the theoretical yield due to factors such as incomplete conversion and side reactions.

Question 3:

How can I use a stoichiometry map to calculate the mass of a product formed?

Answer:

1. Identify the limiting reactant.
2. Determine the moles of limiting reactant present.
3. Use the stoichiometric coefficients to convert moles of limiting reactant to moles of product.
4. Multiply moles of product by its molar mass to obtain the mass.

Question 4:

What is excess reactant?

Answer:

Excess reactant is a reactant present in a reaction in more than stoichiometrically required. It remains unconsumed after the reaction is complete.

Question 5:

How do I use a stoichiometry map to predict the products of a reaction?

Answer:

1. Write the balanced chemical equation.
2. Identify the reactants and products.
3. Use the stoichiometric coefficients to determine the relative amounts of reactants and products formed.
