Key Concept: Todaro's Model of Economic Development (11th Edition)

Question 1: Explain the concept of Todaro's model. Answer: Todaro's model proposes that migration from rural to urban areas in developing countries is driven by rational economic decisions made by individuals in search of better economic opportunities. It suggests that urban wages, although higher on average, are only slightly higher than rural wages, adjusted for the cost of living.

Question 2: What are the key assumptions of Todaro's model? Answer: Todaro's model assumes that:

- Rural-to-urban migration is motivated by economic factors.
- The expected wage in the urban sector is higher than in the rural sector.
- Rural and urban sectors are segmented, and workers cannot easily move between them.
- The supply of labor in the urban sector is elastic.

Question 3: How does Todaro's model explain urban unemployment? Answer: According to Todaro's model, despite the higher wage differential, many rural migrants end up unemployed in urban areas because the urban sector cannot absorb the influx of labor fast enough. This leads to a pool of unemployed migrants in the urban sector, known as "urban unemployment."

Question 4: What are the policy implications of Todaro's model? Answer: Todaro's model suggests that addressing urban unemployment requires policies that:

- Promote rural economic development to reduce the push factors for migration.
- Enhance labor mobility between rural and urban areas.
- Provide training and employment programs for urban migrants.

Question 5: Evaluate the strengths and limitations of Todaro's model. Answer:

Strengths:

- Provides a simple framework to understand rural-urban migration.
- Highlights the role of economic incentives in migration decisions.

Limitations:

- Oversimplifies the migration process by assuming rational economic behavior.
- Does not consider the social and cultural factors that influence migration.
