They can teach us where life and humans came from, show us how the Earth and our environment have changed through geological time, and how continents, now widely separated, were once connected.

How are fossils evidence for evolution? Fossils are essential evidence for evolution because they show that life on Earth was different in the past than it is now. They can use techniques like radiometric dating to determine the age of fossils and so classify them to determine evolutionary links between things.

What are the evidences of the origin of life? There are, at present, four primary sources of information: (1) the record of the early solar system, as preserved in comets or carbonaceous chondrites and on the surfaces of Mars or the Moon; (2) the record of terrestrial rocks—geology; (3) the record of ancient microorganisms and
