Sensation and Perception: 5th Edition VitalSource

Question: What is the difference between sensation and perception?

Answer: Sensation refers to the detection of physical stimuli by the body's sense organs, while perception is the process of interpreting and organizing these sensations to form meaningful experiences.

Question: What are the different types of sensory receptors?

Answer: Sensory receptors include mechanoreceptors (touch), thermoreceptors (temperature), nociceptors (pain), chemoreceptors (taste and smell), and photoreceptors (vision).

Question: How does the brain process sensory information?

Answer: The brain receives sensory information from the sense organs through the spinal cord. This information is then processed in different areas of the brain, such as the somatosensory cortex for touch and the visual cortex for vision.

Question: What are the factors that influence perception?

Answer: Perception is influenced by both external factors (e.g., the environment) and internal factors (e.g., expectations, emotions, and past experiences).

Question: How can sensation and perception be affected by disorders?

Answer: Disorders of the sensory systems or the brain can disrupt sensation and perception. These disorders can include visual impairments, hearing loss, and phantom limb pain.
