Social Psychology: The Aronson, Wilson, and Akert Study

Social psychology investigates how individuals' thoughts, feelings, and behaviors are influenced by others. One of the most well-known studies in social psychology was conducted by Elliot Aronson, Timothy Wilson, and Robert Akert.

Question 1: What was the purpose of the Aronson, Wilson, and Akert study?

Answer: The study aimed to examine the effects of perceived effort on attitude change. The researchers hypothesized that people who experienced greater difficulty or discomfort in expressing a belief would be more likely to maintain that belief, even if it was contradictory to their initial opinion.

Question 2: How did the study test this hypothesis?

Answer: Participants were assigned to one of three experimental conditions. In the high-effort condition, they had to write a counter-attitudinal essay (i.e., an essay arguing against their own beliefs) for 1 hour, while in the low-effort condition, they had to write the same essay for only 15 minutes. A control group received no manipulation.

Question 3: What were the results of the study?

Answer: Participants in the high-effort condition showed significantly more attitude change than those in the low-effort and control conditions. This suggests that the greater effort required to express a belief led to a stronger commitment to that belief.

Question 4: What is the theoretical explanation for these findings?

KEF

Answer: Aronson and his colleagues proposed the "cognitive dissonance" theory, which states that individuals experience discomfort when their beliefs and behaviors are inconsistent. To reduce this dissonance, people tend to change their beliefs to align with their actions.

Question 5: What are the implications of this study for understanding attitude change?

Answer: The study highlights the importance of perceived effort in influencing attitude change. It suggests that individuals who actively engage in a behavior, even if it is initially difficult or uncomfortable, may be more likely to maintain that behavior and the beliefs associated with it.
