1. Generation

The first step in the transmission of electrical power is generation. Electricity is generated in power plants, which convert mechanical energy into electrical energy. There are many different types of power plants, including coal-fired, natural gas-fired, nuclear, and renewable energy sources such as solar and wind.

2. Transmission

Once electricity is generated, it is transmitted to where it is needed. This is done through a network of power lines. Power lines are made of high-voltage conductors that are supported by towers or poles. The voltage of electricity is increased before it is transmitted through power lines to reduce energy losses.

3. Distribution

Once electricity arrives at its destination, it is distributed to homes and businesses. This is done through a network of distribution lines. Distribution lines are lower-voltage conductors that are connected to transformers. Transformers reduce the voltage of electricity before it is delivered to homes and businesses.

4. Consumption

The final step in the transmission of electrical power is consumption. Electricity is used to power a variety of devices, including lights, appliances, and computers. When electricity is used, it is converted into other forms of energy, such as heat, light, or motion.
