TCP/IP Sockets in C

Question 1: What is a TCP/IP socket?

Answer: A TCP/IP socket is an endpoint of a network communication channel. It provides a means for applications to send and receive data over a network using the TCP/IP protocol.

Question 2: How do I create a socket in C?

Answer: To create a TCP/IP socket in C, use the `socket()` function. The function takes three arguments: the address family (usually `AF_INET`), the socket type (usually `SOCK_STREAM` for TCP), and the protocol (usually 0 to use the default protocol).

Question 3: How do I connect to a server using a socket?

Answer: To connect to a server using a socket, use the `connect()` function. The function takes two arguments: the socket descriptor and the address of the server (an `sockaddr_in` structure). The address must specify the server's IP address and port number.

Question 4: How do I send data over a socket?

Answer: To send data over a socket, use the `send()` or `sendto()` function. The `send()` function is used for stream sockets (TCP), while `sendto()` is used for datagram sockets (UDP). The function takes three arguments: the socket descriptor, a pointer to the data, and the size of the data.

Question 5: How do I close a socket?

Answer: To close a socket, use the `close()` function. The function takes one argument: the socket descriptor. Closing a socket releases system resources and terminates the network connection.
