Stealing the Mona Lisa: The Audacious Heist of Carson Morton

Introduction

In 1911, the world was stunned by the audacious theft of the Mona Lisa from the Louvre Museum in Paris. The mastermind behind the heist was a young Italian glazier named Vincenzo Peruggia. However, the involvement of an American named Carson Morton has also been a subject of speculation. Morton's alleged role in the theft has been the topic of numerous books and articles, casting doubt on the true identity of the thief.

Questions and Answers

Q: Who was Carson Morton?

A: Carson Morton was an American who worked as an art handler at the Louvre Museum at the time of the Mona Lisa theft.

Q: What was Morton's alleged role in the heist?

A: Morton was suspected of providing Peruggia with access to the museum after hours and helping him remove the painting from its display case.

Q: Is there evidence to support Morton's involvement?

A: No conclusive evidence has been found to prove Morton's participation in the theft. However, circumstantial evidence and inconsistencies in Morton's alibi have raised suspicions.

Q: Why was Morton never arrested or charged?

A: The statute of limitations for prosecution had expired by the time Morton's involvement was suspected. Additionally, there was insufficient evidence to convict him beyond a reasonable doubt.

Conclusion

Although the true extent of Carson Morton's role in the Mona Lisa theft remains a mystery, his alleged involvement has added to the intrigue surrounding this infamous heist. The unanswered questions and conflicting theories continue to fuel speculation and debate, leaving us forever wondering whether there was an American behind the theft of the most famous painting in the world.
