What does blood feather mean? When a feather is pulled out or falls out during a normal moult (a normal loss of feathers), a new feather is stimulated to start growing right away. As the new feather, also called a pin or blood feather, emerges from the skin's feather follicle, it looks like a spike, quill or much like the feather shaft itself.

How do you tell the difference between a blood feather and a regular feather?

The pin feather looks somewhat like a feather shaft. However, unlike a fully developed feather, the pin feather has a blood supply flowing through it; at this stage, it may also be called a blood feather. As such, if the pin feather is damaged, a bird can bleed heavily.

Why is there blood on my bird's feathers?

How can you tell a blood feather from a mature feather? Because there is an active blood supply to the feather, the quill shaft looks dark - maroon, bluish-purple, or black in color - instead of the usual white or clear look of a fully emerged feather. Blood feathers are normally found on the wings and tail or on the crest of birds like cockatoos.
