Thatched Huts and Stucco Palaces: Peasants and Landlords in 19th Century Nepal (2nd Reprint)

In 19th century Nepal, the society was starkly divided between peasants and landlords. This distinction was reflected not only in their economic status but also in their living conditions.

- Question: What were the living conditions of peasants in 19th century Nepal?

- Answer: Peasants lived in thatched huts, which were typically small, one-room dwellings made from mud and straw. These huts were often overcrowded and unsanitary, providing little protection from the elements.

- Question: How did the living conditions of landlords differ from those of peasants?

- Answer: Landlords lived in stucco palaces, which were spacious and luxurious. These palaces were often made from brick or stone and featured elaborate decorations. They provided landlords with a comfortable and opulent lifestyle.

- Question: What was the economic relationship between peasants and landlords?

- Answer: Peasants were tenants on the land owned by landlords. They were required to pay rent to the landlord in the form of crops or labor. This economic relationship ensured that the landlords maintained their wealth and status, while the peasants remained in a state of poverty.

- Question: How did the social divide between peasants and landlords affect Nepalese society?

- Answer: The social divide between peasants and landlords created a rigid social hierarchy. Peasants were considered inferior to landlords and had no opportunity for social advancement. This inequality led to social tensions and unrest.

- Question: What was the significance of the thatched huts and stucco palaces in Nepalese history?

- Answer: The thatched huts and stucco palaces serve as a physical manifestation of the vast social and economic divide that existed in 19th century Nepal. They represent the contrasting living conditions and opportunities available to peasants and landlords, and the unequal distribution of power and resources in Nepalese society.
